Stay Skeptical: Scammers Are Hoping You Aren't

Scammers are becoming increasingly convincing. They can impersonate banks, government agencies, businesses, friends, or family members and use fear, urgency, or excitement to get you to act quickly.

That's why skepticism is one of your best defenses.

If you receive an unexpected call, email, or text asking for money, personal information, passwords, or security codes, stop and verify. Don't click unfamiliar links, don't share one-time verification codes, and don't let anyone pressure you into making an immediate decision.

Remember, caller ID and professional-looking messages don't prove that someone is legitimate. Contact the organization directly using a trusted phone number or official website—not information provided in the suspicious message.

Most importantly, trust your instincts. If something feels wrong, take a step back and ask someone you trust for a second opinion.

Slow down. Think twice. Verify first. Scammers are counting on you not to.
